And
The Extraordinary Summit on Terrorism and Unconstitutional Regime Changes in Africa

MALABO

23rd to 28th of May, 2022

GENERAL INFORMATION

The Republic of Equatorial Guinea is located in the Gulf of Guinea and is organized into two regional divisions: the Insular Region and the Continental Region.

The Insular Region includes the island of Bioko, where the capital Malabo is located, and the island of Annobón.

The Continental Region is bordered to the north by Cameroon, to the east and south by Gabon and to the west by the Gulf of Guinea. The island of Corisco also belongs to this area. The mainland capital is the city of Bata.

SURFACE AND DISTRIBUTION

The total land area of Equatorial Guinea is 28,052.46 km², which are distributed as follows:

- Bioko Island 2,017 km²
- Annobón Island 17 km²
- Continental Region 26,000 km²
- Corisco Island 15 km²

The country is administratively divided into eight provinces: Annobón (San Antonio de Palea), Bioko Norte (Malabo), Bioko Sur (Luba), Centro Sur (Evinayong), Kie-Ntem (Ebebiyin), Litoral (Bata), Djibloho (Oyala) and Wele-Nzas (Mongomo).

AIRLINES COMPANIES THAT FLIGHT TO EQUATORIAL GUINEA

THE WEATHER

Equatorial Guinea is characterized by enjoying a clearly equatorial climate, characteristic of areas near the equator. This climate is very similar to the tropical: both share low thermal amplitudes and high temperatures. The biggest difference is that the rainy season in the tropical climate is more irregular and less intense, while in the equatorial climate the rains are very abundant and regular, and usually exceed 1,500 or 2,000 mm per year.

From there, each of the regions of Equatorial Guinea has its own characteristics.

ISLAND REGION: BIKO AND ANNOBÓN

In the Insular Region we find an equatorial-type climate in Bioko, with a dry season from November to March and a rainy season from April to October. The climate is temperate, influenced by warm marine currents and by the relief of the island, with a monsoon component in its southern part and an average annual temperature of 25°C, which can fluctuate around 2°C.

Annobón's climate is similar, with a dry season from June to October and a wet season from November to May. The average annual temperature is usually 26° C.

MAINLAND REGION

The climate of the continental region presents two dry seasons: the first of them occurs between December and mid-February and the second and more important, from July to September. We can also find two rainy seasons: one from March to June and another from September to November.

In the continental region, the average annual temperature is around 25° C, with an oscillation that does not exceed 5° C. The main rainfall occurs between the months of September and December, from 1,800 to 3,800 mm, and the humidity relative is around 90%, falling to 85% in the dry season.

The wettest areas are found in the mountainous area of Mount Mitra and on the border with Gabon, in the Mitemele basin.

THE RELIEF

As the country is divided into two zones, the Insular and the Continental, the geographic and relief variety of Guinea is as wide as it is rich.

Mainland zone

It is formed by a part of the coast that becomes more mountainous as we go inland, where we find a series of chains called "of the Seven Mountains". One of the greatest wealth of Equatorial Guinea is, precisely, the exuberant and leafy jungles that we find in these lands of soft undulations.

The relief of the Continental Region can be grouped into three types of formations:

- The coastal area, sandstone and marl.
- The interior zone, mainly gneiss.
- The eastern zone, granitic.

Orography of the Continental Region:

1.- Kie-Ntem Plateau: descends to the west and continues to the coast through the Ntem peneplain.

2.- Central peneplain: it descends towards the Muni and Mitemele basins and is crossed by rocky outcrops.

3.- Mongouba Platform: we find it in the eastern part of the Niefang Chain, with peaks that reach 1,200 m in altitude.

4.- Massif of Mitra: we find the highest areas of the Continental Region: those of Mount Mitra or Mount Alen, in the south of the Niefang Chain.

5.- The Muni and Mitemele basin: this is a trench between the Niefang chain, on one side, and the Crystal Mountains, on the other.

6.- Peneplain west of the Niefang Chain.

The Island Area

The island of Bioko is of volcanic origin and, therefore, mountainous and also very wild. From any part of its surface we can be amazed to see the silhouette of the Basile peak, formerly known as the Santa Isabel peak. As for Annobón, its physiognomy is also of volcanic origin, composed mainly of basaltic rocks.

Orography of the Insular Region:

1.- Bioko. The island is divided into a northern and a southern block, separated by a central depression near Musola, and is part of the volcanic chain that crosses diagonally from Lake Chad to Ascension Island.

It is of volcanic origin, with a landscape of deep valleys and steep reliefs. The island is made entirely of volcanic rocks. We found three calderas: Pico Basile (3,011 m) in the north and Pico Biao (2,009 m) and the Gran Caldera de Luba (2,261 m) in the south.

2.- Annobón: It is located in the volcanic mountain range, mentioned above, together with Bioko, São Tomé and Príncipe.

Featured Items:

- 1.- Lake A Pot boiler.
- 2.- Crater of the southern area in the east of Punta Manjob.
- 3.- Corridor that joins the Bays of San Pedro and Santa Cruz, routed by the Anganchi river.

The vegetation.

Despite the small size of the country and due to its landscape diversity, Equatorial Guinea is one of the areas with the greatest biodiversity in Africa, since we can find from the classic beaches with black volcanic sand to incredibly lush forests or alpine lands at 3,000 meters high. Aware of this wealth, the Government has reserved almost 20% of the country's land for the conservation of natural life.

The flora of the Continental Region

At least three quarters of the Continental Region is covered by huge forest formations. Within them, the predominant one is the perennial shady forest, also called humid forest. This type of forest is typical of the tropical or equatorial climate and is characterized precisely by the density and height of the plant formations that occupy it.

In addition, a good part of this area is occupied by crops and fallow land, which give rise to enormous thicknesses of bushes and lianas through which it is almost impossible to enter and which serve as a refuge for an enormous and very rich wild fauna.

The flora of the Insular Region

In Bioko, below 700 m -maximum altitude for cocoa cultivation-, cocoa, coffee and banana plantations occupy most of the forest area, although much of it remains unexploited today. The vegetation, similar to that of the continent, has only been maintained in some areas.

In the southern part of the island, we find a type of rain forest, rich in orchids, thanks to the 10,000 mm of water it receives each year.

The perennial shady forest develops from 700 m to 1,800 m, with a large number of tree ferns. From that altitude, meadows appear along with low plant formations. On the Basile peak we find formations of ericaceous plants.

In the northern area of Annobón, savannah and deciduous tree formations grow, since the island's climate is less rainy. In the south, the tree zone is much denser due to the influence of the monsoon.

The wildlife.

The animal population of Guinea is in luck, since they live in a country where nature continues to be as great as it is virgin, but where development also allows adequate measures to be taken for its conservation in the future.

More than a hundred diverse mammals are part of this fauna: small antelopes, pangolins, felines. The country is especially rich in diversity of primates: gorillas, chimpanzees, mandrills, colobus. But in Equatorial Guinea you can also find some large mammals such as the jungle elephant, the hippopotamus, the wild pig or the manatee.

Equally numerous are the species of reptiles and amphibians, and four species stand out, the sea turtles that frequent the coast of the Litoral Region.

In the coral reefs of Corisco we find a marine fauna that swims common in Central Africa. It is also important to mention the coast of Moraka, near Ureca, in Bioko, as one of the most privileged places in the area to observe the sea turtles laying eggs.

Also noteworthy is the rich inventory of Equatorial Guinean birds, with more than three hundred known species: as well as that of aquatic fauna, with more than 167 species of fish registered. Both inventories have started, but are still incomplete.

Likewise, the world of insects, of extraordinary diversity is still pending to be inventoried.

Equatorial Guinean cuisine offers a wide variety of dishes and is influenced by both African and European cuisine. In rural areas, the basis of food is meat and fish, and in the big cities we can find restaurants where we can taste both traditional African food, Western and, especially Spanish dishes, such as potato omelette or Paella.

Currently, in the two big cities, Malabo and Bata, you can already find hotels with a wide range of menu options, as well as pizzerias or small restaurants where the gastronomy of the area is combined with more western food. There are no very strict rules regarding hours, so it is easy to eat anything at any time of the day, until closing time.

The main difference between African and European cuisine lies in the use of sauces made from typical products of the country such as peanuts, pumpkin, modica, yams or ocro. Another clearly differentiating element is the inclusion of wild animals in the preparation of some dishes.

Fish is also an important part of the national cuisine. When trying it, it is worth looking for those places where they will serve us an exquisite freshly caught piece, and simply ask for it grilled. In some towns they can even serve us an amazing freshly caught lobster. Nor should you miss, if possible, a delicious dish of typical snails or sea snails.

Pepesup (spicy fish soup) is one of the basic dishes of Equatorial Guinean cuisine, like pangolin with chocolate, bambucha or peanut soup. And almost all of them are usually accompanied with rice or plantain.

One of the main secrets of Guinean cuisine is the use of the seasoning called andok, which is collected for local consumption, but which, during good harvests, is also exported to other countries.

The typical drinks are palm wine or topé (it comes from the palm tree) and malamba (sugar cane), although today the most popular drink is beer and wine, most appreciated by tourists, since you can find your favorite brands almost anywhere, and it's especially nice for braving the hot, humid tropical environment.

In the typical markets of Guinea we can also find a huge variety of fruits and vegetables, such as papaya, pineapple, banana, plantain, avocado, mango, coconut, bisong, guayave, engong... and a long etcetera that are truly exceptional, both for its size as for its quality and flavor.

ETHNIC GROUPS, CULTURES AND LANGUAGES

Almost the entire population, with the exception of the Pygmies, belongs to the Bantu people. More than seventy million individuals that extend throughout Central, Eastern and Southern Africa belong to this denomination.

Despite the great ethnic and cultural variety that shares territory, and unlike what unfortunately happens in other African countries, in Equatorial Guinea today, the different cultures coexist with each other in full peace, without ethnic problems or confrontations.

Ethnic groups and cultures

Fangs: They form the largest ethnic group, traditionally their coexistence is structured in relatively autonomous families, clans and tribes. Offspring is transmitted through males, hence the importance of the father, the uncle and the firstborn. Their wooden sculptures, masks and ritual fang statues are appreciated throughout the world.

Bubies: They are on the island of Bioko and they are Bantus belonging to the so-called "yam civilization", their society was structured in the form of a kingdom that remained until the end of the colonial period. Their original religion was monotheistic and their traditional music, dance and song were inspired by religious ceremonies that are still deeply rooted.

Pigmeos: In Equatorial Guinea they are called Beyeles and Bokuigns, they live in small groups and are dedicated to hunting and gathering roots and wild berries.

Ndowes: It is a minority people, made up of numerous ethnic groups: the Kombe, the Bujeba, the Bapuku, the Balenke, the Enviko and the Benga. Their social organization is hierarchical in families, towns, lineages and clans.

Bysios: Originally from Cameroon, they are few in number and emigrated in the XIX century towards the nearby coastal regions of the continental region, via the Ntem River.

Fernandinos and Criollos: Bourgeoisie of landowners and merchants, who lived for a long time in the capital and were mestizo descendants of workers who settled for centuries on the plantations of the island of Bioko.

Annoboneses: They are located on the island of Annobón and are a mixture of Portuguese, Spanish and slaves of African descent, they have traditionally been fishermen, since agriculture is scarce on the island as it is a volcanic land, they use canoes known as cayucos, made ceiba wood. Most dominate the Fâ d'Ambô dialect which is a Portuguese creole mixed with Spanish.

LANGUAGES AND DIALECTS

Spanish is the official administrative and teaching language. French is the second official language, Portuguese the third official language, and almost all ethnic groups speak the so-called Bantu languages.
